

In Passing over

— brother Augustine

As upon the woolly, thick skin
Of a large mammal in hibernation,
I look down upon this brown,
Wooded, winter earth,
Speckled with patches of snow.
From high in our safe, passing isolation,
I long to touch her sleeping body—
To console for the wounds
We so easily inflict without thought.

